PIER 39's recycling efforts help divert more than six million pounds of waste material from local landfills each year. Along with cardboard, mixed paper, plastic, glass and aluminum, PIER 39 offers an organic/wet garbage composting program for its full-service restaurants, resulting in more than two million pounds of food waste recycled annually. Splashy Sea Lions

The sea lions that camp out in PIER 39's West Marina have been an international sensation for more than 25 years. A few California sea lions began "hauling out" in PIER 39's West Marina shortly after the 1989 San Francisco Loma Prieta earthquake. The boisterous barking pinnipeds started arriving in droves and took over K-Dock in January 1990. At first, they numbered from 10-50, but due to a plentiful herring supply, the available dock space and protective environment, the population soon grew to more than 300 within a couple of months.

The Marine Mammal Center, an organization devoted to the rescue and rehabilitation of marine mammals and the study of these animals' health, advised PIER 39 that the sea lions should be allowed to stay. As a result, The Marine Mammal Center and PIER 39 have worked together for the last two decades to ensure the health and well-being of PIER 39's sea lion population. An educational program was also developed to educate visitors and school groups about these marine mammals.

In November 2009, a record number of sea lions were counted on K-Dock (1,701 to be exact!), but later that same month, their numbers quickly dwindled. By December 2009, only a handful of sea lions were hauled out on K-Dock. Researchers at The Marine Mammal Center attributed their departure to a shift in their food source that caused the population to travel to other regions in their normal range including the Oregon Coast to feed. However, the California sea lions slowly began migrating back to PIER 39, much to the delight of locals and tourists who gather from all over the world to watch the playful mammals.

You can watch the sea lions from wherever you are around the world! Visit the Sea Lion section on pier39.com to check out the Sea Lion Webcam.
